A New Hampshire woman, whose husband allegedly ran over her with a car, is speaking out about the horrific ordeal for the first time.

With a broken collar bone, broken hand, and a broken heart, Saturn Alleyne recalled the worst day of her life.

"I just remember I couldn't die that way, I wasn't going to die right there, I couldn't," she said.

Last Monday afternoon, she and her husband, Jason, got into a fight. Alleyne says he followed her to a Bow gas station and threatened to kill her.

She was pinned under the car and could only think of one thing – her daughters.

"Alayna was the first one that popped into my head, my oldest," Alleyne said holding back tears. "She's seen a lot, she's been through a lot, she's strong though."

Five men came rushing to help and lifted the car off of her.

"I would love to meet them because without them I wouldn't be here," she said.

Alleyne says her happy marriage took a dramatic turn when she and her husband started using crystal meth.

She says over the last year, the abuse was every other day.

"Whether it was a push, a punch, a hit, or a spit," she explained.

But she never imagined this.

"How could he do this? I don't understand," Alleyne said.

But in some ways Alleyne is thankful. She is now clean and says this kind of clarity doesn't come without tragedy.

"We could've had a completely different life, we could've had a happy life," Alleyne said. "It's taken me until this to realize that but I look back and I'm like, 'wow, what have I done.'"

Alleyne has made a promise to her family to stay clean and spend the rest of her life teaching her girls the importance of respecting themselves.
